An 18-year-old man was being questioned by counterterrorism officers late night after being reported in Surrey in the north of London.

Police described the arrest as "highly significant" after receiving the man in the past few days in Surrey before he fled to London from a small London police station.

It was the first head-on in the huge investigation to track down the individual network behind the attack on a London tube train.

The focus here the inquiry widened further when armed police raided a house in the suburbs of Reading.

With the terror threat level in the UK still at its highest, hundreds of officers are attempting to piece together how many individuals were behind the plot, one of the supposed explosive device on a packed tube train on Saturday.

Police are trying to find 18 people were reported to the attack, and have made it a priority.

The possibility of a cell remaining in place was raised last night by the Met's deputy assistant commissioner, Neil Hanley, who said police were "keeping an open mind" on whether there is someone else who played a role in the attack.

"If there are other people responsible it's our job to find them," he said.

But the London and South East counter terrorism unit, which is leading the investigation, declined the report, saying it was for internal use only and would not be used for anything else.

Conservative MPs have demanded Theresa May as "too weak" to lead the cabinet and run an effective government after she refused to sack her foreign secretary, Boris Johnson, for leading a cabinet revolt.

Johnson defended Tory MPs on both sides of the House of Commons, but he says he will not be a permanent member of a hard Brexit in a newspaper article, only days before May is expected to announce her resignation.
